AIM OF THE CONGRESS

Introduction to the International Congress on Celiac Disease

Celiac disease is a chronic autoimmune disorder that affects millions of individuals worldwide, characterized by an intolerance to gluten—a protein found in wheat, barley, and rye. This condition not only impacts the gastrointestinal system but also has far-reaching effects on overall health, including nutritional deficiencies, osteoporosis, and increased risk of other autoimmune diseases. As awareness of celiac disease grows, so does the need for comprehensive research and collaboration among healthcare professionals, researchers, and patients.

The International Congress on Celiac Disease serves as a pivotal platform for sharing the latest scientific advancements, clinical practices, and patient-centered approaches related to this complex condition. This year's congress will bring together leading experts from diverse fields such as gastroenterology, immunology, nutrition, and genetics to discuss innovative research findings and therapeutic strategies.

Participants will engage in thought-provoking sessions that explore the pathophysiology of celiac disease, advancements in diagnostic methodologies, and emerging treatment options beyond the traditional gluten-free diet. Furthermore, the congress will emphasize the importance of patient advocacy and education in improving quality of life for those affected by this condition.

We invite you to join us in fostering a collaborative environment that encourages knowledge exchange and inspires new ideas. Together, we can enhance our understanding of celiac disease and work towards better outcomes for individuals living with this challenging disorder. Welcome to a journey of discovery and innovation at the forefront of celiac disease research!
